

Earthquake Festival 1983

30 April Evenementenhal Borne.

On Queen's Day 70% of Aardschok's editors left for the remote town of Borne in Overijssel, to indulge in an avalanche of Heavy Metal violence that lasted all day long.

As many as 16 groups were allowed to show their talents, only three of them were able to steal the show.

The first seven bands were 'small' amateurs, who were only allowed a short time on stage [..]

After a short break, Bodine were allowed the honours to entertain the bored audience. (Some were busy breaking up the pavement, others were fooling around at the bar). They didn't manage, because the sound was dreadful. The drums were too loud, the guitars too shrill, 'Madman' Axel's voice sounded like squabbling and to make matters worse all of the lights were turned on. Thus, bass player Armand van der Hoff's last gig with Bodine turned out a failure and the band went packing after playing five songs only.
